Deirdre Ayani Blythe is struggling to find her own path to happiness in a world where everyone around her, from her FBI bound best friend to her soon to be married perfectionist twin sister, seems to have their entire life figured out.

Every decision that Deirdre has made up until this point in her life has been a direct result of her desire to have a “practical” life– a message that has been pounded into her head over and over again by her parents since the time she was a child. Deirdre was taught that if she followed a direct and concrete path she would experience a life full of happiness. Up until this point, she has done everything that she was supposed to do, but then why isn’t she happy?

As Deirdre ponders this question, she is introduced to an enticing young man, Tahapenes, whose overwhelming arrogance is an initial turn off for Deirdre, but after encouragement from her best friend, Deirdre decides to give this mysterious man a chance. Tahapenes not only ends up pushing her to pursue her true passion that Deirdre had been suppressing since childhood, but he also opens her up to experiencing love that she didn’t even realize that she needed.
