Joya Hernandez, newly graduated from nursing school, takes a part-time job in the town's fitness center. She had planned to become a nurse at the local hospital but then the facility closed, shutting the door on her original plans and forcing her to find a job where she can. But she likes working at the fitness center; she gets along with the members and she cares about the people. She's from the wrong side of the tracks, the daughter of a single mother who owns a bar in a down-at-heel part of town. Life hasn't been easy for them, but thanks to her mother's determination and resolve, Joya believes that she will be able to make her way in the world. Joya was raised with strong morals and the conviction that she's as good as anyone. Both of those beliefs are put to the test when she meets her new boss, Drew Benedict, the son of the fitness center's owner. Drew's ideas on how to run the fitness centers seem guaranteed to bring him into conflict with his stepmother who is the real power in the operation. But it's the personal relationship more than the professional one that has Joya on a roller-coaster of emotion. Her well-dressed, Lexus-driving, confident boss is showing a romantic interest in his employee and Joya is convinced that Drew is out of her league. But when he makes his feelings known, she's torn between her yearning for his love and her fear that their backgrounds are too far apart for them to ever share a life together.
