Chapter 4

Pillars of Heaven

Hong Kong, China

Hole 3

The horizon stretched on forever over the sea and land. It was a golfer's paradise to be sure. But only a madman would dare create a tee off from the top of a pillar mount to an oasis of green in the middle of the picturesque rice fields.

Lexi the Score Keeper announced to the teams, "Hole 3 is only 69 yards and a Par 3. Though it is short, the seven hundred yard descent can be deceptively difficult. The sea coast is blessed with dramatic changes in temperature and winds."

"Indeed," whispered the luminary lady to Hage as she silently sidled up between him and his partner. "The weather factor is absolutely damnable. Your club selection is crucial. Everything depends on the direction and the strength of the wind."

Dixie added, "An embedded ball in the green suffers a one stroke penalty for removal from the turf."

Ambassador Henry announced, "General Hung Yu will now give a demonstration on how to play his famous Pillars of Heaven hole."

The general used a niblick with a smooth stroke that barely sent the ball off of the grassy plateau. It sailed with a graceful arch toward the ground. It landed on the front of the lily pad shaped green.

The ball rolled slowly for forty feet and then fell into the cup. The ring of servant girls around the green applauded their master. The crowd of natives atop the monolith cheered for their god of golf. The teams were dumbfounded and speechless.

The luminary lady explained the trick to Hage, "General Hung Yu has his servants and greens keepers holding parasols to keep the sun off of their heads. But it is also to hide the other servants holding large fans. The swiftly fluttering fans blow the ball across the short grass into the cup every time. I have seen the ball do circles around the cup before it finally fell in. The general never loses on his own course."
